

THE ATMOSPHERIC EXPERIENCE

Now these bars are sculptural moments that define a room and lend it a different energy. Each one approaches luxury differently: bold red curves that catch light and hold attention, layered glass over mirrors that shift through the day, and dark moody spaces that slow you down, different yet unique, the three invite you to stay, rewind and reenergise. What ties them together is restraint. Yes, they make a statement with their high-gloss finishes, hand-blown glass, and aged brass detailing, without overwhelming. The materials do the talking here: Panda White stone against polished wood, glass tiles catching light at different angles, and black -and-white inlay patterns that give your eye something to follow. These choices aren't decorative, they're structural and integral to how each piece feels and functions. "It's not just about how something looks but how it behaves," says Sachin Gupta, founder and principal designer, Beyond Designs. He's right. A bar anchored by mirrored panels changes as natural light moves across it. Brass catches evening light differently than noon. These pieces live in real time responding to their environment rather than just occupying it. The best part? They actually make you want to sit down. Not because they're performing some design trick, but because they create the kind of atmosphere where conversations happen naturally, where you're not rushing to the next thing.

Clockwise from left: High-gloss red bar in wood; bar with hand-blown glass tiles layered over mirrored panels; jewel-themed bar; Noir Wave bar; Gold Foil home bar

