

Clockwise from far left: An outdoor bar with motorised curtains, green creepers and backlit onyx countertop and panel; backlit onyx wraps the bar back and floor; metal bar with a rhythmic, wave-like structure and different height settings

CONTEMPORARY CRAFT

The home bar designs move beyond function to become immersive experiences shaped by material, light, and craftsmanship. Though created for very different settings, both treat the bar as an artistic focal point, something to be experienced as much as used.

The outdoor bar by The Arch Studio blends architecture with landscape, creating a luxurious setting that feels open yet intimate. Its curved form softens the surrounding structure and draws people together. Backlit onyx adds a warm glow that transforms the space after dark, while gold-toned metal, stained mirrors, and patterned stone flooring introduce depth and reflection. Framed by greenery and sheltered beneath a light glass pavilion, the bar feels connected to nature without losing its sense of refinement. Every curve and finish is carefully crafted, giving the space the presence of a living sculpture.

While the home bar by Disha Subramanium, principal designer, Design by Disha Subramanium, takes a quieter, more refined approach. Created as a luminous monolith, it uses backlit onyx, layered textures and sculptural detailing to create a seamless, atmospheric setting. Soft lighting flows across surfaces while bespoke panelling and glass elements add depth without excess. The result is elegant and understated, a space where luxury comes through material precision.

Together, these projects show how bar design can move beyond utility to shape mood and experience. One embraces openness and landscape, the other creates intimacy through light and restraint.