These days Harmanpreet Kaur's new bestie is the camera. It's there when she is shooting magazine covers; when she is endorsing her growing list of brands; when she is recounting her journey at corporate events, and even at airports. From being alien to the world of make-up, she now understands the artist's cue to 'pout'. Just don't ask her to use the eyelash curler on her own. It's Kaur's fifth consecutive day facing the bestie and she is in her zone. "I am not complaining," she says. "We need to do it to promote the sport." That sport is women's cricket and Harmanpreet Kaur has been devoted to it for three decades now.

The journey which began in the gulleys and grounds of Moga in Punjab reached its pinnacle at the DY Patil Stadium in Navi Mumbai on Nov 2, 2025, when Kaur led the Women in Blue to its maiden ICC trophy, with India winning the Women's Cricket World Cup, making us ODI champions. Kaur always knew it would take that one trophy to stir the revolution she had always envisioned for the women's game. Four months later, she is still feeling the ripples of it. "Players' attitude has changed, there's self-belief and confidence now," she says. "People are talking about women's cricket and parents are thinking about encouraging their daughters to play cricket and think of it as a career." That seismic shift from the sport being a gentleman's game to a more democratic one, open to all, is of utmost significance
