

TRUE BLUE
A carefully curated living space infused with colour, charm and character events, the layout is flexible. "When we have a bigger number of people, we sometimes take away some of the furniture to make space for people to mingle," shares Östberg.

A favourite feature for guests is the expansive terrace. "It's very popular, especially among Swedes; they like to be outside on the terrace. Indians tend to be inside," he notes with a smile. Whether it's hosting a seated dinner for foreign diplomats or a festive Christmas choir of Indian children singing Swedish carols, the home is a bridge between two cultures.

Swedish Heart, Indian Soul

Living in India has left a permanent mark on the Consul General, both in his wardrobe and his worldview. While his home is filled with Swedish timber and textiles, his closet tells a different story. "I'm always very keen on Indian clothes," he admits. "I usually wear kurta pajama to work and also in my spare time."

Beyond the fashion and a newfound love for spicy pav bhaji, India has gifted him a change in pace. "I think when you live here for a while, you get more patience," he reflects. "You become more attuned to life being unplannable and follow the flow more than you can in a country like Sweden, where everything is very tightly planned."

As Sweden continues to expand its footprint in India, from IKEA's rapid growth to AI sports ventures, this residence remains the ultimate symbol of that partnership. A space that is understated in design, yet overflowing with the warmth of Indo-Swedish hospitality.