

When we set out to design House XIII, we envisioned a home that would act as a layered sanctuary, balancing the need for expansive social connection with the necessity of intimate privacy. The homeowners came to us with a desire to completely rethink their existing residence, which led us to a bold spatial reorganisation that flipped the traditional domestic layout on its head. One of our most significant interventions was the removal of the central staircase to make room for a sleek lift. This strategic decision did more than just improve accessibility; it reclaimed vital floor area that we repurposed into high-function zones like a luxury walk-in wardrobe for the master suite and a sophisticated pantry-bar area. By treating spatial limitations as opportunities for innovation, we were able to introduce these new amenities without expanding the home's original footprint.

Light and Flow

On the lower level, we focused on creating a bright, welcoming environment specifically tailored for entertaining and social interaction. To overcome the challenges of low ceilings and smaller windows, we curated a light and neutral palette that visually stretches the space. We chose white marble flooring to reflect every bit of natural light, while tulip veneer finishes and soft taupe tones provide a calm, elegant backdrop for the living and

CONTRASTING COMFORTS
(left to right) Serene, light-washed living space; a moody, cocooned den; relaxed, layered nook where muted tones and playful textures invite everyday lounging