the artistic legacy of Santiniketan.

The photographs, originally too small and fragile for conventional display, have been digitally enlarged and paired with contextual captions and texts. Among the highlights are images of Mahatma Gandhi's visit to Santiniketan and intimate portraits of Tagore that reveal a more vulnerable and contemplative figure than his familiar public image.

Shaha's daughter, renowned scientist Chandrima Shaha, believes her father's gentle temperament shaped the photographs. "Most of the time, Tagore was unaware that he was being photographed," she says. "My father was a very soft, non-intruding person." She also recalls his love for candid observation, describing how he sought to capture "the soul of Kolkata's streets" and moments that could "tell their own story".

Born in Midnapore in 1905, Shaha became known for documenting Santiniketan, Calcutta and everyday life with unusual sensitivity. Presented as part of the international Bicentennial of Photography celebrations, An Artscape and a Poet offers a rare glimpse into Santiniketan's cultural history through the lens of one of India's most significant early photographers. ■

Garments That Speak

DUTCH ARTIST AFRA EISMA'S TEXTILE-BASED INSTALLATIONS—DISPLAYED AT MAP, BENGALURU—EMERGED OUT OF THE 'METOO' MOVEMENT

Can clothes reflect feelings, especially about conversations like sexual violence that are often pushed under the carpet? Warrior Garments, at Bengaluru's Museum of Art & Photography (MAP), had me musing about the politics of costumes and sexuality in this Met Gala-addled season.

The curated collection of eight installations is made with silk and organza, and was first shown at the Kochi Biennale. The artist, Afra Eisma, was part of the 'MeToo' movement in the Netherlands in 2020 and has created these textile installations to visually express her feelings.

Each of these garments has text on them, some easily read, others less visible. "I wrote some of this in a moment of rage and some of it felt too emotional or personal to display. That's why I also use this kind of semi-transparent material because it allows me to layer it," explains Eisma.

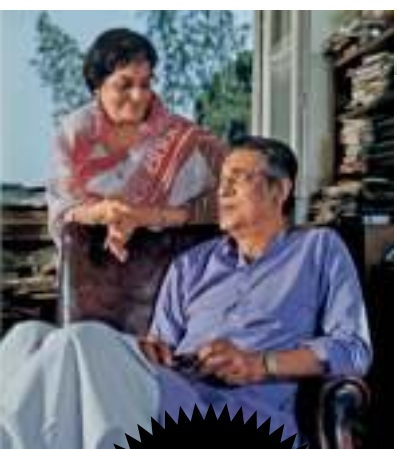

As I walk away, I read the questions on the wall: "How do you wear your anger?" and "How do you make yourself feel safe in bearing the richness of a boundless emotional life?" And these exhibits made me stop and think. After all, anger is not just about holding on to rage, but also a way to transform oneself positively. ■

The show presents several iconic and rare images during the filming of Ray's films as well as the filmmaker at work

Ghosh became his photo-biographer. Ghosh's unpublished colour photographs of Ray are like a forgotten treasure trove. A new exhibition in Delhi focuses on them.

Taken over a 25-year period, Faces and Facets: Satyajit Ray in Colour presents several iconic and rare images of actors, scenes, sets and locations from the filming of Ray's films as well as the filmmaker at work. It envisions Ray beyond the celebrated auteur the world knows him as—thinking, working, writing, sketching, directing and listening. Sensitively capturing moments of introspection and authority, it invites viewers to encounter him anew through the quiet radiance of colour.

"Nemai Ghosh's colour photographs reveal a Satyajit Ray we rarely encounter—intimate, reflective, immersed in the rhythms of creation. Beyond documenting a cinematic giant, these images capture the atmosphere of Ray's world: the warmth of his interiors, the intensity of his process, and the quiet moments between films," says Ashish Anand, CEO and MD, DAG. ■
