Some of the most memorable summer homes are discovered unexpectedly, at a gathering, a long lunch, an evening visit, where the space itself feels as inviting as the people within it. This is where summer design reveals itself. Not in what is added, but in what is taken away. In the decision to edit, to lighten, to create room for the season to exist within the home. Here's how styling can help your home adapt to the needs of the season.

1. Let things breathe. Create space between objects and resist the urge to fill every surface. A sense of openness allows rooms to feel lighter and more expansive, setting the tone for a relaxed summer environment.

2. Reduce visual weight. Do this by moving away from heavy furniture, dark palettes and dense materials. Introduce lighter forms, softer finishes and a more restrained visual language that instantly lifts the mood of the space.

3. Choose breathable fabrics. Linen,
