

Look 1
Victorian-Colonial Sanctuary

In the first room (image, left) , the design language is defined by a distinct Victorian-colonial character. Rather than trying to change its inherent personality altogether, the festive overlay works in harmony with it. A bold combination of indigo and hot pink, colours that are inherently festive, intertwined with white, blue and subtle touches of green can be seen here. The richness comes through entirely in the materials. High-tactile surfaces like silks and velvets bring in that subtle sheen traditionally associated with the festive season. The bed is heavily layered with a luxurious Shades of India bedcover, matching shams and throws. The look is completed with elegant silverware, vases, fresh florals and candles that catch the light.

Mid-Century Modern Retreat

The second bedroom (image, previous page) speaks a completely different design language, rooted in clean, mid-century modern lines. Here, the festive spirit relies on strict balance, offering pattern with restraint and richness without excess. Furniture by Jagdish Sutar already features beautiful, built-in brass detailing. The accessories simply follow that cue. Ikat cushions by Kainaat introduce structural pattern, while a soft, floral wallpaper by UDC adds an organic softness that allows the clean furniture lines to hold their own. Open shelves by Vakr were styled with deep intention. Kept within a muted palette, they feel thoughtfully collected and intimate rather than cluttered or overly decorated. Soft side-table lighting by Yaahvi introduces a warm, intimate glow.

At the end of the day, festive styling doesn't need to be excessive. Sometimes the smallest, quietest additions, fragrance, softness, sheen and memory, are exactly what make a room feel most extraordinary.
