Where Flavour Meets Style

A Diwali menu should cater to different age groups and preferences, with a good balance of vegetarian and non-vegetarian dishes. “You could have comforting Indian favourites such as dal makhani, paneer adrakhi or Mutton Champaran along with a selection of breads,” says Gupta. You can also bring in lighter, more contemporary options such as an artichoke and edamame salad, a winter apple and cranberry salad, soups, dim sum or even sushi. It is about creating a menu where everyone at the table finds something they enjoy.

A Dash of Tradition

Food should always be the hero. The plate and table should support it, not compete with it. If the food is beautifully plated, it’s best to let the serveware have character without becoming distracting. A table laid with special dinnerware, serveware, flowers, and a mix of silver, copper and natural materials sets the mood even before the food arrives. Luxury comes from making everything feel considered and celebratory, not from trying to make the table look restrained.
