Q. Has India become safer or less safe for women?

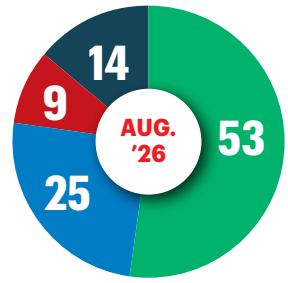

On women's safety, fewer see progress or decline, even as more say the situation remains the same

Q. Do you think we are doing enough to protect the environment?

Confidence in India's environmental protection efforts remains steady, and well above the 2025 levels

Q. Has climate change affected your own life or livelihood?

Yes, significantly | Yes, a little | No | DK/ CS

A clear majority feels that climate change has affected their lives or livelihoods

All figures in % and rounded off; DK/ CS: Don't know/ can't say tion, the trend appears to be one of diminishing conviction that things are improving. Among those who see deterioration, the BJP-RSS remains by far the largest named reason, cited by 18.8 per cent of the full sample, although that figure too has fallen from earlier surveys.

Women's safety shows a similar shift. The proportion saying India has become safer for women has fallen sharply from 44.1 per cent in January to 38.3 per cent. The 'less safe' figure has also declined, from 38.4 per cent to 33.8 per cent. Instead, 'remained the same' has jumped from 13.8 per cent to 21 per cent, its highest reading since 2021. The message is not that Indians suddenly see the country as dramatically more dangerous for women, but that fewer see any progress.

Yet the survey makes clear that this discontent is not an anti-Modi shift. Support for a Uniform Civil Code remains high at 75 per cent, near its peak since 2021. One Nation, One Poll still commands 70 per cent support, despite slipping from 74 per cent in January. More than three-quarters see illegal immigration as a serious threat. These are issues central to the BJP's framing of national identity, security and institutional reform. The public may be growing more critical of the government without moving away from much of what it stands for.

35 PER CENT of higher-educated respondents say India is doing enough to protect the environment, lowest across all groups

Respondents also appear keen on reforms they believe could make the democratic system fairer and more accountable. Nearly two-thirds want a stronger anti-defection law. On delimitation, more respondents favour protecting states that successfully controlled population growth from losing representation rather than allocating seats mainly according to current population. And on the Women's Reservation Act, 47.2 per cent want its implementation without waiting for delimitation. The broader preference is for political rules that are fair, predictable and resistant to manipulation.

Even climate change has become strikingly personal. More than half of respondents, 52.7 per cent, say it has significantly affected their lives or livelihoods. Yet 59 per cent believe India is doing enough to protect the environment, broadly unchanged from January and substantially higher than in early 2025. Here again, personal anxiety has not automatically translated into anti-government sentiment.

The survey shows growing discontent across several fronts, but not necessarily a demand for political change. The deeper question is whether Indians can still trust the system—and the Modi government's ability to make it work. ■