

It is eight o'clock on a Friday in Mumbai's Bandra and a 140-year-old building is doing what old buildings do best, holding secrets. This is The Find Atelier, one of the city's most talked-about supper clubs, where sisters Aalisha and Riona Sable are putting the final touches on the menu. The walls around them have witnessed more than a century of Bombay's stories; tonight, they will witness one more. Welcome to the world of the supper club, the most intimate, most coveted and most delicious dining experience to sweep India's culinary landscape.

While the country's fine-dining scene continues to amass awards and accolades, a shift is taking place behind the teak doors of some of India's most beautiful homes. Across Mumbai, Delhi, Bengaluru and Hyderabad, a new generation of chefs, home cooks and culinary storytellers have turned their private spaces into some of the most coveted dining destinations in the country. Take The Supper Club in Mumbai's Lokhandwala, where chef Raji Gupta hosts evenings entirely devoted to Karnataka cuisine, a food culture rarely given its due on the city's restaurant menus. Guests are served on banana leaves and guided through the a cuisine that stretches from the coast to the Deccan plateau. It is less a dinner and more a quiet act of cultural reclamation, for ₹4,000 a person.

In Hyderabad's Banjara Hills, 78-year-old Dilnaz Baig hosts Dastarkhwan-e-Naz, traditional Hyderabadi dinners where guests sit cross-legged on low seating chowki amidst yellowed family photographs and heirloom items. That she came to cooking professionally only in her 60s makes her story as unlikely as it is charm-
