

ing. The menu comprises dum ki biryani, shikampur, dum ka murgh, mirchi ka salan, baghare baingan, tamate ka kut and a paan to close. A second menu of khatti dal, aloo methi kheema, palak gosht and machi ka salan exists for NRI Hyderabadis. "They hanker for this kind of simple food," says Baig. Her guest list has included CEOs, celebrities and the occasional surprise. Ralph Fiennes once dined at her table. Baig had no idea who was coming. "I was told I shouldn't have any other guests. So I assumed it must be a politician." It wasn't until Fiennes spotted cricket photographs on the wall that the evening shifted. Her husband, former first-class cricketer Murtuza Ali Baig, had opened for Oxford, as had Fiennes' own father. Soon the two were trading averages across the chowki. A seat at her table costs ₹5,000.

If Baig's table is rooted in memory and inheritance, The Find Atelier is built around atmosphere. Guests arrive to a modest doorbell, ease into the evening at the bar and eventually gather around a long communal table. By dessert, strangers tend to feel like friends. The 140-year-old building is central to that alchemy. "It already holds history, texture and a sense of timelessness. The space plays an active role in the narrative, it shapes the way guests arrive, interact, linger and connect," says Aalisha Sable. Dinner here costs ₹6,500 a person, with cocktails and straight drinks charged separately. At The LOST Table in Gurgaon,
