SUPPER CLUB ETIQUETTE

WHAT FIRST-TIMERS SHOULD KNOW

- → Arrive on time
- → Be open to communal seating
- → Tell the host about dietary restrictions in advance
- → Come ready to talk to strangers
- → Don't assume BYOB unless stated
- → Expect the menu to be part of the surprise run by husband-wife duo Archit Agarwal and Natasha Ratti Kapoor, the mood is playful, curious and deliberately eclectic. At ₹3,500 a person, a typical afternoon sees guests arriving to a welcome drink, Archit introducing the month's menu and a game appearing between courses. The dishes range widely: Turkish flatbread lahmacun, hot honey fried chicken with mac and cheese, miso pasta and nammoura, a Middle Eastern semolina cake. The one constant across two years is the slow drip picante, a jalapeño-brine drink where the cocktail mix is frozen into the ice cube that intensifies slowly as it melts.

The setting matters just as much. Today, supper clubs are as much about architectural curation as they are about the menu. Art Deco chandeliers casting amber light on a dinner party. A host's private art collection as the evening's backdrop. A grandmother's curio cabinet standing sentinel by the door. These are settings that no commercial space, however expensively designed, can replicate. This is fine dining hosted in the warmth of a home. "It is not really a supper club if it is not hosted

Clockwise from Above left: Crackers with roasted red pepper dip at The Lost Table; Archit Agarwal and Natasha Ratti Kapoor of The Lost Table; Banana leaf meal at The Supper Club, Mumbai; The Find Atelier in a 140-year-old building in Mumbai; Raji Gupta's at her home in Mumbai