in a personal space. The photos on the walls, the books, the table setting, even the occasional power cut, it all becomes part of the experience. Most guests even bring something for us, a bottle of wine, flowers, a small gift. This rarely happens in a restaurant, and it speaks to how personal and reciprocal the experience feels," says Archit.

In Delhi, V's Supper Stories serves Latin American-inspired food shaped by Vrinda Taneja's seven years working in a Mexican kitchen in Melbourne. For ₹3,100 a person, her menu includes arepas (cornmeal cakes stuffed with savoury fillings); ají de gallina (Peruvian chicken stew); birria (slow-cooked meat served in tacos); and chocolate tarts with a chilli twist. Some evenings are built around themes like Friendsgiving where Ross's sandwich became a turkey slider, the Geller Cup turned into croquettes, and Rachel's trifle made a deliberately questionable appearance. Taneja places name cards in advance based on who she thinks might connect and keeps guests on their feet for the first 15 to 20 minutes. Dessert is when the evening truly eases up, guests drifting to the kitchen counter to watch her plate, some asking to help, others staying until six after a brunch that wrapped at half past three.

A Storied Past

The supper club is not a new concept. Its roots stretch back to 19th-century Europe, where artists, intellectuals and socialites would gather in private salons to dine, debate and conspire. In 1920s Paris, these underground gatherings were as much about the conversation as the cassoulet. But
