

Kinoya grew from a home supper club into a world-class dining destination, combining Izakaya style with a dedicated focus on masterfully crafted everyday dishes and drinks, and has won several awards in the UAE.

the bowls she posted, but to the process behind them. They were drawn to the sincerity of the journey, to the idea of someone teaching herself one of the world's most exacting comfort foods with almost academic intensity. The transition from documentation to dining happened naturally.

After inviting a supplier friend whom she bought ingredients from, over for dinner, Mishra ended up cooking for a small group of strangers. The guests that evening went back telling others about "this Indian girl making ramen." The word spread. Soon, Mishra was hosting one dinner a week at home. Then two, then three to finally a full-fledged supper club. Soon, her home had turned into the site of a fledgling supper club.

By 2018, the experiment had evolved into something much larger. Mishra began hosting 10 to 12 guests at a time, six days a week, for an eight-course ramen-led dinner out of her home. She did everything from cooking, serving, cleaning, plating and preparing between courses herself. It was intimate, exhausting and entirely unpretentious.

Demand kept building. Dates announced on social media would get booked in seconds. Bookings filled months in advance. What had started as a quiet personal project had turned into one of Dubai's most sought after dining experiences.

Over time, she pushed the format further, taking on pop-ups for more than a hundred people at a time, often prepping everything on her own. Those years became her real education. Not culinary school in the formal sense, but something arguably more valuable. Then came the Covid pandemic. It brought a halt to the supper club. By then, Mishra had already served more than 7,000 guests. That lockdown though forced another pivot. She began selling ramen kits and doing deliveries. She started hosting limited supper clubs when restrictions briefly eased. But the disruption also clarified something bigger. If the supper club had proved the appetite was real, the next step was obvious: To open her restaurant. In April, 2021, Kinoya opened in Dubai.

The leap was enormous, she recalls. "It's one thing to cook for 10 people in your home. It is another to open
