

entirely male. For a generation of new India's wealth creators, these clubs were not aspirational. They were relics. And into that gap, something extraordinary began to grow.

THE NEW INDIA PROPOSITION

India's new class of HNIEs do not seek what their predecessors sought. They have access to the finest hotels, best restaurants, and the most prestigious addresses. What they seek is the right room. A room where the conversation is different; where the agenda is unstated; where trust is assumed rather than earned.

The private members club is the architecture for that room. And the numbers confirm that India is ready for it at scale. The market for private members-only clubs stood at Rs 576 crore in 2024 and is projected to reach Rs 941 crore by 2027—growing at a annual rate of 17.8%. There are more than 25 operational clubs across India's metros, spanning over a million square feet of curated space. Registered memberships have crossed 11,000, growing at over 8% annually.

WHAT PEOPLE SEEK

Community. In an age of digital saturation—where every interaction has a metric, every relationship a feed—genuine human connection has become a luxury good. The private club offers what Ray Oldenburg, the sociologist who coined the phrase, called a 'third space'—not home, not office, but a place to simply be present with others.

Curation. The great frustration of affluence is that money can buy access but can't curate company. A hotel bar is open to anyone. A members' club is not. The screening, a referral system, or an invitation-only model, is not snobbery. It is architecture; it ensures that the room contains people worth being in a room with.

Privacy. India's UHNI community operates under a degree of social scrutiny that is exhausting. Private cluba, above all else, is a sealed
