360°, The Oberoi, New Delhi—2004

The Dining Room that Never Needed a Signature Dish

In an age when every restaurant seems to need a hero dish, a viral plate or a photograph designed for Instagram, 360° offers a different definition of greatness. Its signature is the experience itself.

At The Oberoi, New Delhi, 360° has long represented the hotel's particular interpretation of cosmopolitan dining—an expansive culinary journey rather than a restaurant built around one cuisine.

And that is a very Oberoi Hotels quality. The room is elegant without being theatrical. The service is attentive without being intrusive. The food moves across

Suvarna Mahal, Rambagh Palace, Jaipur—1835

The Golden Palace that Hosted Kings

Some restaurants are designed. Suvarna Mahal was inherited. Originally the royal banquet room of the Jaipur royal family, British designer Sir Anthony Millbank dressed its walls in exclusive ivory damask and the finest silk. The walls that once carried the flags and battle honours of the Jaipur armed forces, have since given way to mirrors, but the old-world charm—and the Rajputana courtesy that came with it—has not moved an inch.

The kitchen's philosophy is just as unhurried. The menu circles three of India's great culinary courts —Rajasthan, Awadh and Punjab—each recipe drawn, quite literally, from royal rasodas rather than restaurant test kitchens.

Signature Laal Maas, Dhundhar Murgh, Dal Baati Churma & Suvarna Mahal Shahi Tukda.

The Suvarna Mahal lesson Some restaurants don't need to recreate royalty. They simply never stopped being it.
