

cuisines without losing the refinement expected of the address. The Oberoi once described 360° as "the drawing room of Delhi." It is an apt description. This is the restaurant where breakfast can become a business meeting; where a business meeting can become lunch; where lunch can stretch into an afternoon of conversation. Its strength: Reliability elevated into an art form. That is an increasingly rare form of luxury.

In a restaurant culture obsessed with novelty, 360° demonstrates that sometimes the most sophisticated experience is simply knowing that everything will be done beautifully.

Golden Dragon, The Taj Mahal Palace, Mumbai—1973

The Restaurant that Taught India to Love Sichuan

Golden Dragon has one of the most fascinating histories on this list. Established at The Taj Mahal Palace, Mumbai in 1973, it became an important early ambassador for Sichuan and Cantonese cuisine in India's luxury hotel landscape. Consider what that meant at the time.

Flavours that are now familiar to Indian diners were once considerably more exotic. Sichuan cuisine—with its distinctive heat, aromatics and complexity—was not yet a mainstream part of India's culinary vocabulary. Golden Dragon helped change that.

It made Chinese dining part of India's luxury restaurant culture and helped establish the idea that international cuisine could be presented with authenticity and seriousness. That makes Golden Dragon more culinary pioneer than old restaurant. And the most interesting thing about its story today is that it is still moving forward.

The Golden Dragon brand has begun extending beyond its historic Mumbai home, taking its Sichuan-Cantonese identity to new audiences. That is significant because the real test of a legacy restaurant is not whether it can preserve its past, but how well it can foray into the future. Golden Dragon has survived more than five decades; legacy is not necessarily about looking backwards; sometimes it is about taking everything you have built and opening another door.
