

world is changing fast, and we have to adapt, while still remaining authentic. In my opinion, the digital-forward approach is a natural evolution, and we have a very strong team that truly understands markets.

Q: The new Hydroconquest, which was released a couple of months ago, went viral on social media. How does Longines handle leads and purchases coming through social media as opposed to traditional channels like stores?
We take our social media leads very seriously now. While brick-and-mortar stores are very important, I'd like to highlight that this year, we have had record-breaking sales through our e-commerce platforms. Our growth this year from e-commerce globally has exceeded 60 per cent year-on-year. We have a dedicated team specialising in digital strategy to build awareness but also to convert sales. At the end of the day, if we go viral like in the case of the Hydroconquest, we need to capture the digital momentum.

Q: Longines is so closely associated with the world of sports, like the Commonwealth Games and equestrian events. Could you tell me more about your continued association with the sports world?
For Longines as a brand, I find it
