INTERVIEW

CEO/LONGINES

quite fitting that we should be associated with the world of sports. It is in our identity and DNA. In fact, our involvement in sports timekeeping has essentially shaped our reputation. In sports timekeeping, you cannot have an 'almost accurate' or a 'maybe'—it has to be perfect. And we have been associated with sports timekeeping for more than 140 years. To remain a trusted global partner even today is a big deal. And that's why today sports is important, not only technically, but also for capturing emotions and an audience that goes to watch sport for inspiration, aspiration, and for the joy of it.

Q: What's in store from the Longines stable in the future?
The Longines Master Collection 2026 that we just launched in August features some really interesting time pieces, in particular one, that will appeal to watch enthusiasts. In the coming year, we will be celebrating our 195th anniversary of the brand, and we have a big reveal for that occasion.

Q: How do you perceive the Indian market in your overall brand story?
The Indian market is at the top of strategic markets for Longines. The proof is the expansion that we are witnessing today in boutiques that we are deploying around the market. India is a very complex and diverse market. I have travelled over 30 times to India so I have begun to understand the market. It is not an easy market for many brands. I have gone from city to city, with sales people, retailers, and media. I have highlighted India as a strategic market on my roadmap. It is very promising to become one of the biggest markets for Longines in the world. There is a lot of goodwill for the brand in India. Today, we have waiting lists for the Hydroconquest, which makes me so happy.
