

Decoding the Layout

Inside, the spatial layout is smartly organised across three distinct levels to meet the chaotic rhythms of a multi-generational family. The ground floor acts as the social anchor, housing the communal zones, an expanded kitchen and the parents' bedroom. Here, full-height sliding glass panels erase the boundary between the living room and the lush garden outside. The first floor transitions into a private sanctuary of bedrooms, each opening up to balconies framing the surrounding greenery. The highest level shifts into a dedicated entertainment zone, boasting a lounge, an open-air pantry and a terrace with water features designed for long, breezy evening gatherings.

Layered, Quiet Curation

Architecturally, the arch is the undisputed hero of the interior, recurring consistently across doorways, balconies, and wall niches to create soft structural anchors. The aesthetic canvas remains decidedly muted, relying on limewashed walls and concrete-finish floor tiles to pull focus toward the textures. Furniture choices are kept understated, allowing material grain and shifting natural light to take centre stage. This restraint serves a purpose: it provides a quiet backdrop for a beautifully layered collection of vintage finds, handcrafted Indian objects and personal art pieces that the family has collected over a lifetime of travel.

Global Accents, Local Hands

Where the house truly shines is in its execution of global details using regional techniques. The kitchen breaks the neutral palette with vibrant, pattern-rich tiles that nod directly to Spanish interiors. Underfoot, custom, cast-in-situ terrazzo winds its way up the staircases and across outdoor terraces, injecting an unmistakable layer of Indian artisanship. The bathrooms pivot toward a more monolithic, spa-like atmosphere, utilising smooth Indian Patent Stone (IPS) walls to maintain visual continuity.

Nature is not treated as an afterthought or a decorative layer at Casa Tlalli; it is stitched directly into the architecture. Every balcony features custom, integrated planter beds, ensuring that vivid greenery and crisp ventilation are a part of the daily domestic experience. What emerges at the end of this architectural journey is not a literal carbon copy of a Spanish villa or a Mexican home. It is a highly personal, sophisticated tapestry of places, materials and memories; a home that feels entirely aspirational, yet comfortingly familiar.
