Mitti Home is a 7,000 sq ft, ground-up reinvention, an ambitious renovation that merges two ageing apartments into a singular, expansive residence for a family of four. Conceived as a sanctuary of stillness, the home is anchored in the elemental presence of clay, drawing its very identity from mitti, earth. What emerges is a space that feels deeply tactile, contemplative and quietly luxurious.

From the outset, the design intent was to create an immersive environment rooted in calm, where materiality, light and proportion take precedence over ornament. Clay plaster becomes the defining gesture, wrapping the home in a soft, breathable skin that shifts gently with the light throughout the day. This commitment to natural finishes extends across the entire property, with a conscious focus on sustainability and eco-sensitive choices. From lime and clay-based surfaces to breathable linen textiles used for drapery and upholstery, the home is designed to feel as good as it looks.

Overcoming Structural Constraints

The project arrived with inherent structural complexities. Combining two older apartments meant negotiating a rigid grid of columns and intrusive beams. Instead of concealing these constraints, the design absorbs them into a new spatial rhythm. The home was entirely gutted, with walls stripped away to reveal volume and possibility, before being reconfigured into a series of open, light-filled spaces that flow seamlessly into one another. The result is expansive yet intimate, a careful balance of scale and softness. Architectural detailing plays a subtle yet defining role. Doorways were reimagined with softened, rounded edges, introducing a quiet retro inflection that lends the home a sense of nostalgia while maintaining its contemporary restraint. These curves gently offset the otherwise linear geometry, allowing transitions between spaces to feel fluid and almost sculptural.
