FOR THE PERFECT POUR

Why this hands-free glass kettle is the ultimate salvation for picky tea lovers

By RIDHI KALE

For someone who carts 1.5 litres of water, meticulously divided across four distinct, delicious teas, into the office every single day, the prospect of reviewing a gleaming borosilicate glass kettle got me far more excited than I'd care to admit. In a world where everything is available at the press of a button, shouldn't hot water tempered to your exact preference receive the same royal treatment? Enter the Wonderchef Crystal Tap & Flow Glass Kettle & Hot Water Dispenser (1.7 litres).

Unlike standard plastic or metal eye-sores, this beauty lets you watch the hypnotic, rhythmic dance of water heating up. Does it change the actual science of boiling? Not a jot. But it's precisely these aesthetic flourishes that truly separate the connoisseurs from the crowd.

The best part? This stunning multitasker isn't just a pretty face on the countertop; it boils, sets precise temperatures, keeps water warm and dispenses like an absolute pro. If you've ever scalded your delicate green tea leaves or turned your morning coffee into a bitter penance, this gadget is your salvation. A built-in sensor and live digital panel let you adjust the heat from 45°C to 80°C in neat 5°C increments.

Even better, the clever Keep Warm mode ensures you don't have to re-boil the same water twice. But the real party trick is the hands-free dispensing. A single press and hot water flows seamlessly (albeit a tad slowly for my impatient liking). There is no heavy lifting, no awkward tilting and absolutely zero risk of clumsy spills. Thanks to a built-in battery, it untethers completely from its power base, letting you dispense your brew wherever the mood strikes. Plus, it hits a full boil in about five minutes, splendidly fast.

The only fly in the ointment? A mysterious, minor water leak that occurs after the device is switched off. It's entirely possible I've inadvertently pressed something I shouldn't have, but until I solve that riddle, draining the kettle after use is the safest bet.

Barring that minor quirk, this nifty device will thoroughly upgrade your daily caffeine rituals with the mere flick of a switch.
