Step into pérodise and you won't just see fashion, you'll feel the tactile poetry of 17 years of p é r o. Located in Delhi's historic Lodhi Colony Market, the brand's first-ever flagship store is conceived as a literal extension of its clothing: deeply layered, entirely handmade and full of secrets. Co-designed with Milan-based Conzatti Solanki Architects, the space fluidly merges a 1,500 sq ft interior with a 2,500sq ft outdoor courtyard using openable folding doors that effortlessly invite the outside in.

"Like our clothing, there are a lot of things that are done by hand in this space," explains founder and designer Aneeth Arora. This artisan-first philosophy dictates the very fabric of the environment. Beneath your feet lies a masterclass in ancient technique, a four-coloured terrazzo floor, mixed and spread completely by hand. Curving brass strips trace the contours of the room, dividing the vibrant terrazzo sections, which are intimately inlaid with custom-made, hand-blown glass hearts. Look up, and the overhead canopies are lined with traditional, earth-toned terracotta clay tiles painstakingly crafted by native potters in Odisha. Even the apparel rods and hangers are bespoke works of art, meticulously hand-beaten by local metal artists into p é r o's signature heart-with-wings motif.

Moving away from conventional retail, the layout rejects standard seasonal displays. While one corner showcases fresh, quirky pieces from the current collection, another dedicated space serves as a permanent sanctuary for the brand's extensive archives and beloved classic silhouettes. It is a living environment built for slow discovery rather than a quick transaction. "I don't think it is a space that will reveal itself the first time when a person visits," shares Arora, adding, "They'll discover different things about the space in every visit."

Imbued with warmth and spontaneity, pérodise ensures that every single return trip feels like uncovering a new, beautifully hidden stitch. That's not all, Arora is planning to launch a dedicated showroom for their home line soon. Keep watching this space for more.
