

A multi-functional room should not be thought of as a space that performs several functions simultaneously. Remember, it is more about creating a robust and timeless spatial framework that can accommodate changing patterns of living. The starting point is the architecture itself. Good proportions, natural light, ventilation and a sense of openness that creates a space that can support different ways of inhabiting it. Rather than designing a room around a prescribed set of activities, create an environment that can adapt as the needs of its occupants change.

This also means resisting the temptation to overdesign. Timelessness comes from getting the fundamentals right, using materials and details that age gracefully rather than relying on elements tied to a particular moment or trend. The architecture should have enough strength and simplicity to remain relevant as the furniture, technology and lifestyle of its occupants evolve.

Within that framework, we like to think of the interior
